"What are you doing, Ollie?" asked Henery Hawk one day.

"I'm reading the paper. I like to keep up with the news. It wouldn't hurt you one bit to do something other than chase chickens, either, Henery Hawk," scolded Ollie Owl. "Here," he continued, "why not look in the Help Wanted section. Maybe you can find a better way to spend your time."

Henery started to read, just to please Ollie, but without any real interest, until his eyes happened to fasten on a very interesting ad. "Chicken Inspector Wanted. Apply 12 Noon, Chicken Specialty Factory, Old Surrey Road."

"What time is it, Ollie?" asked Henery.

"Eleven-thirty. Why?" answered the owl.

"I have to go and see a man about a job," Henery called as he rushed away.

He ran all the way to Old Surrey Road and stood panting in front of the factory.

"I sure hope I get the job," Henery thought as he knocked on the door of the main office.

The door was opened a moment later by a man who appeared to be the boss. He asked Henery to come into his office.

Henery introduced himself and then listed his qualifications. "I've always been interested in chickens," he boasted, "and I have studied them for years."

The boss looked Henery over very carefully. "Yes. I think you will do nicely for this job."

"Thank you, sir," nodded Henery happily. Then to himself, he mused, "Ollie Owl was right. This is my chance to make something of myself — something of a pig, that is!" he added, thinking of all those chickens he was going to "inspect."

The boss led Henery to another room and told him to hang up his coat. Then he gave him a long, white, apronlike coverall. "I hope you don't mind," explained Henery's new boss, "but we like to keep everything neat and tidy."

"It couldn't be better," said Henery aloud, all the time thinking how very co-operative the boss was to provide him with a king-size bib to wear. "Lead the way," smiled Henery as he tied the apron around his waist.

The boss led the way down a long hall, then threw open the door to a room in which Henery could see a conveyor belt.

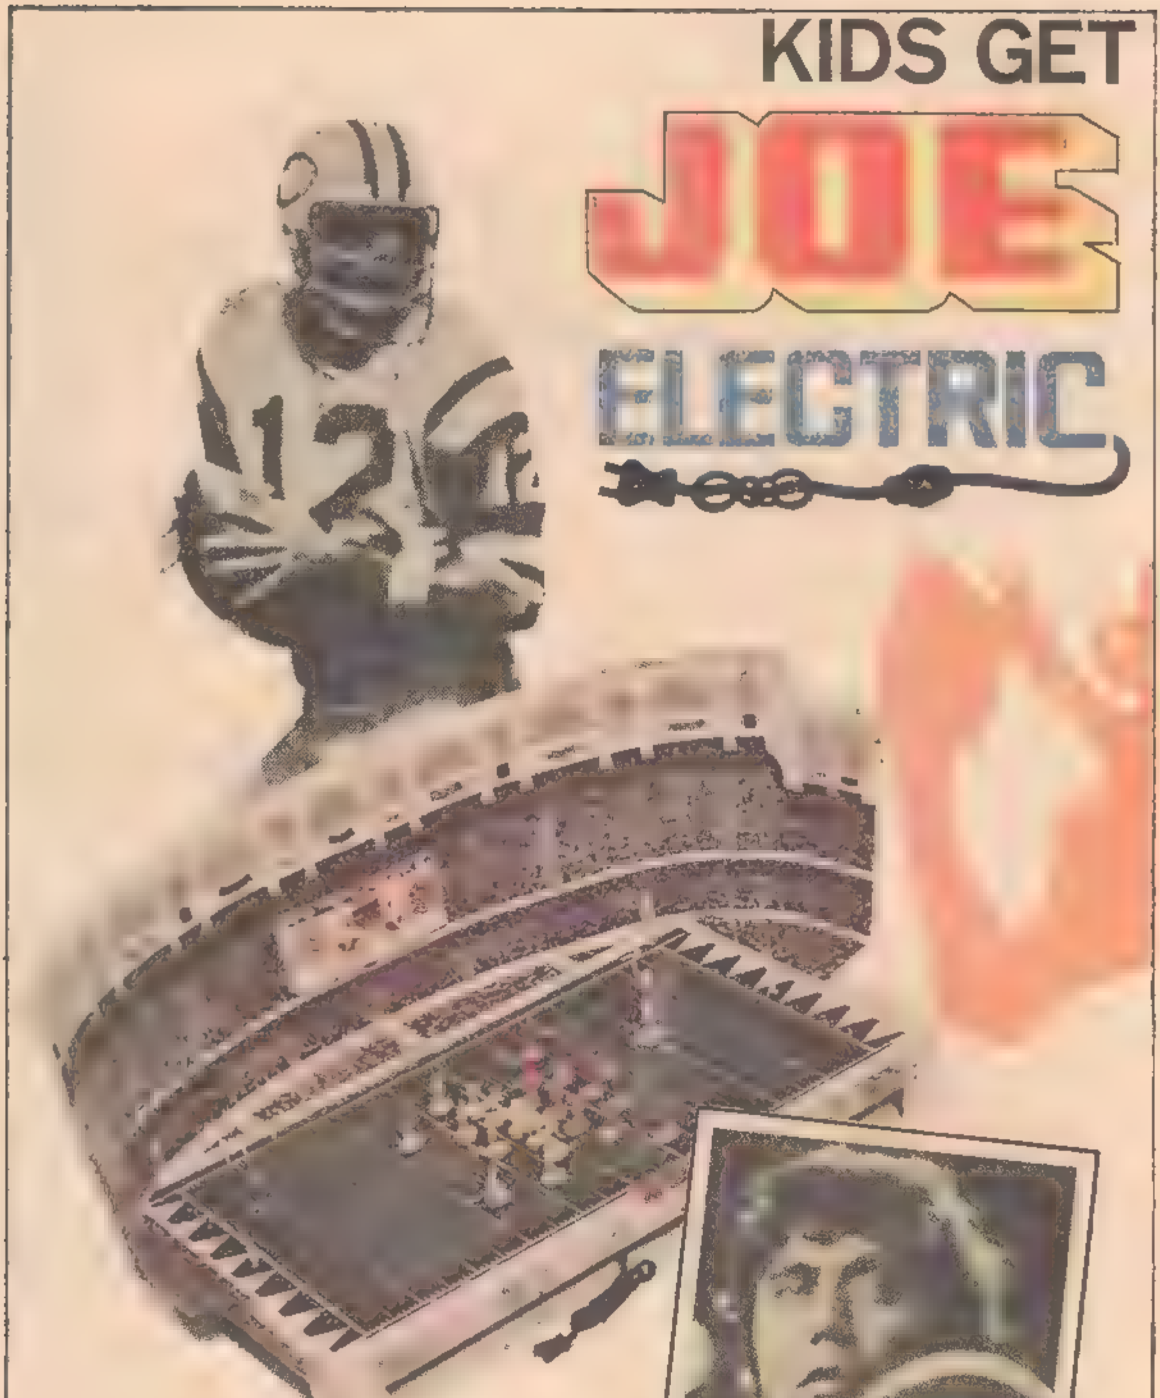

"This is where you will work," explained the boss. "The chickens will move down this conveyor belt to you. You will check them for color, size, and any imperfections they might have." Then the boss pressed the button to start things rolling. "I'll leave you to your work now," he said as he closed the door behind him.

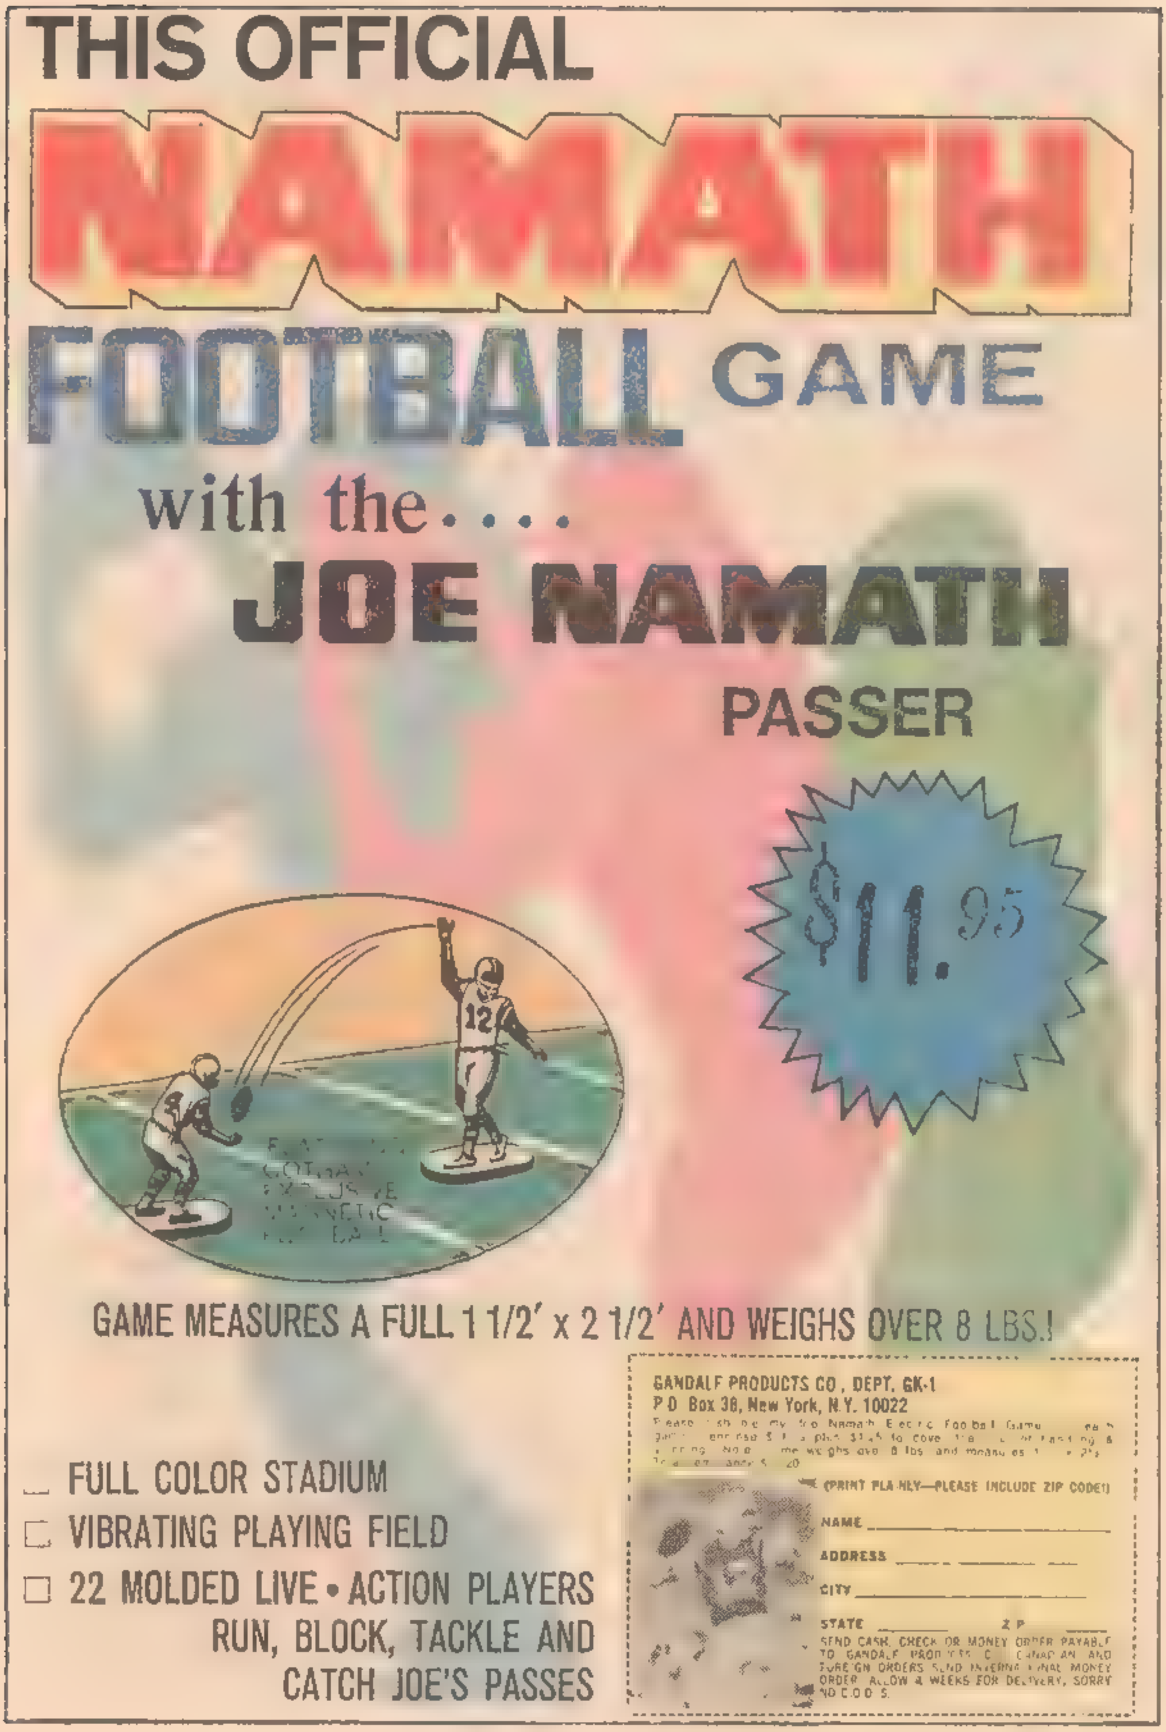

Henery took his place at the head of the conveyor belt and waited anxiously for the first chicken to appear.

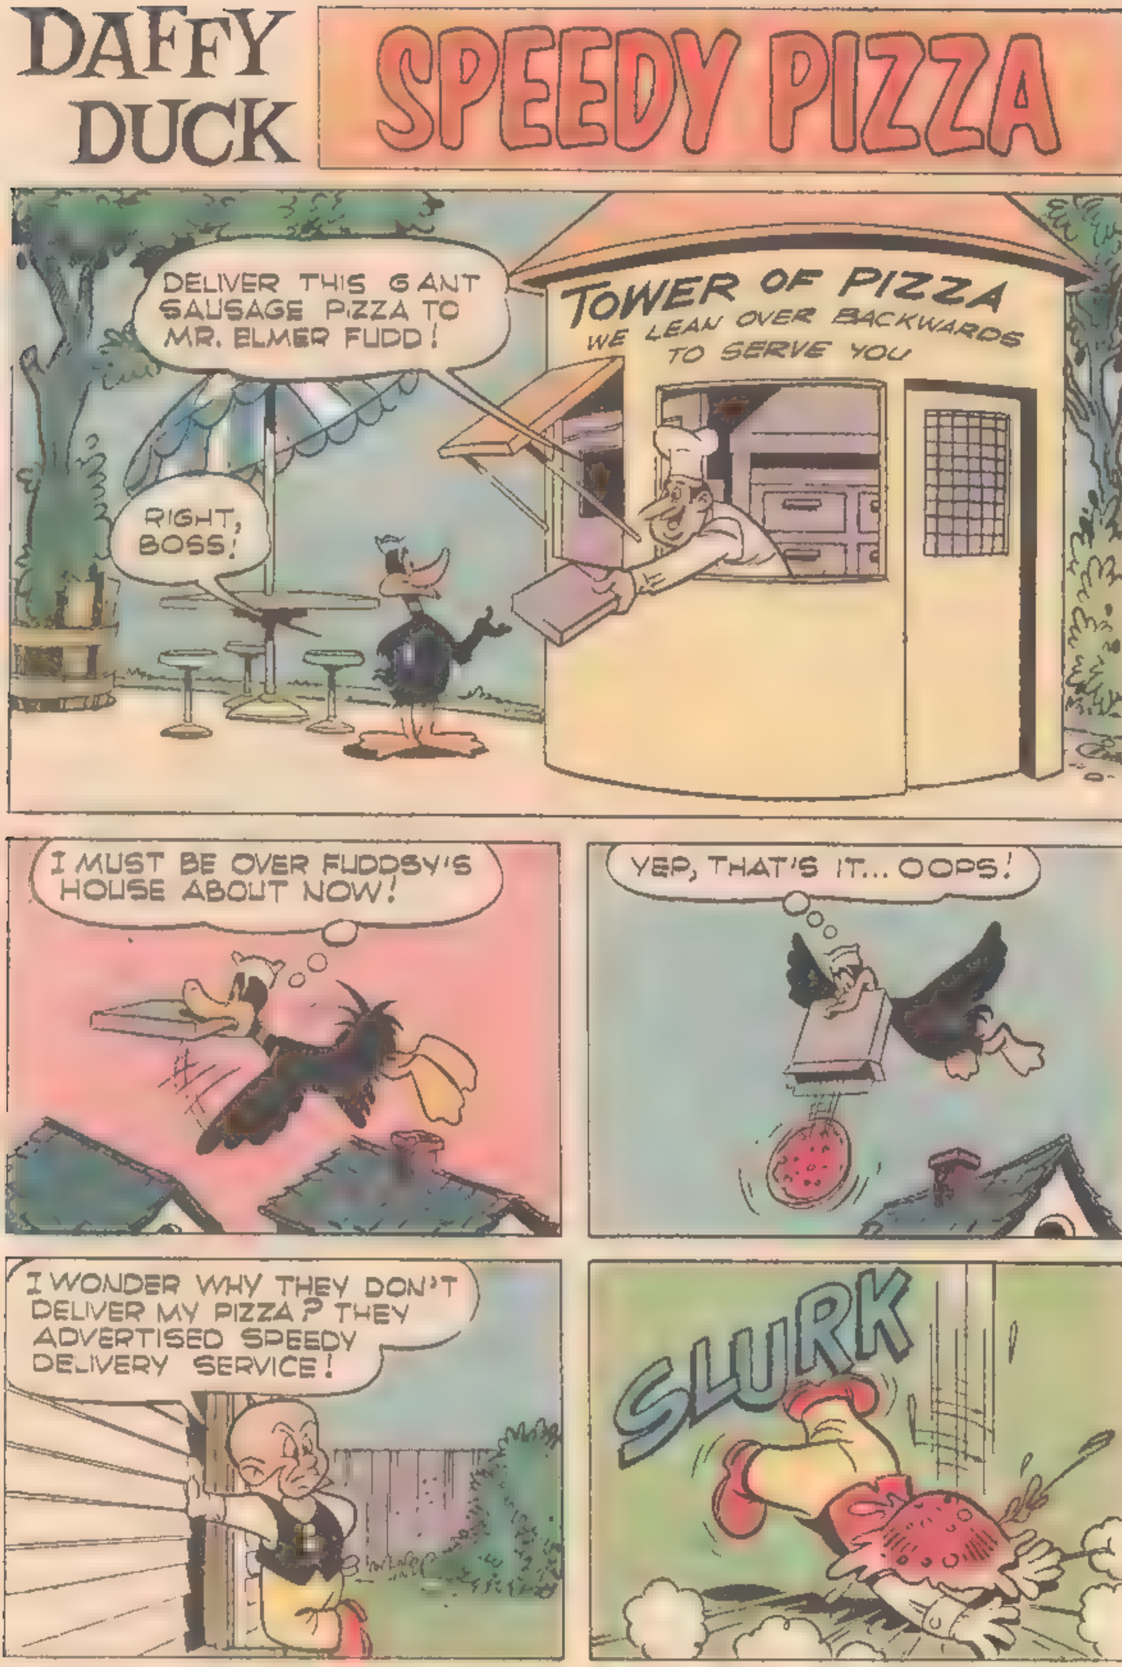

When it did, poor Henery nearly choked — but only on his own tears of disappointment, not on the tasty chickens that he had been dreaming of.

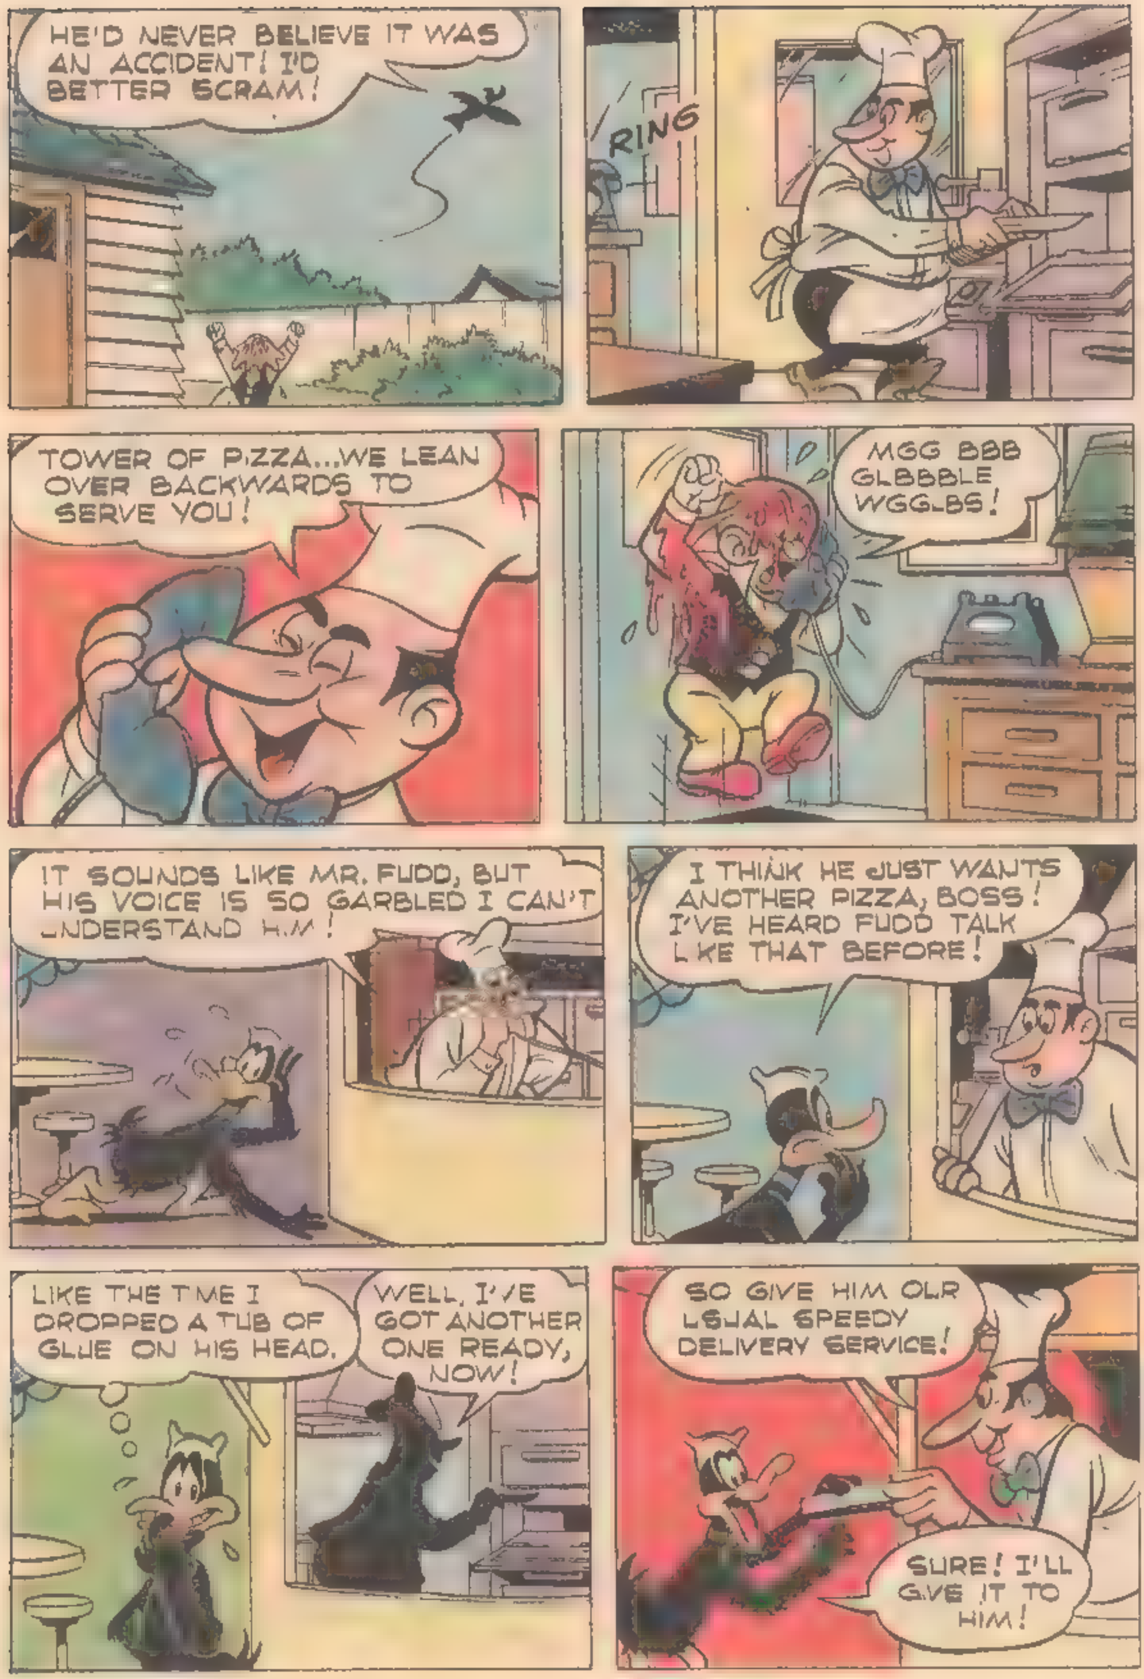

The chickens he was to inspect were nothing more than china models to be sold in gift stores, not the delicious, tender, meaty morsels found in butcher shops or chicken coops.

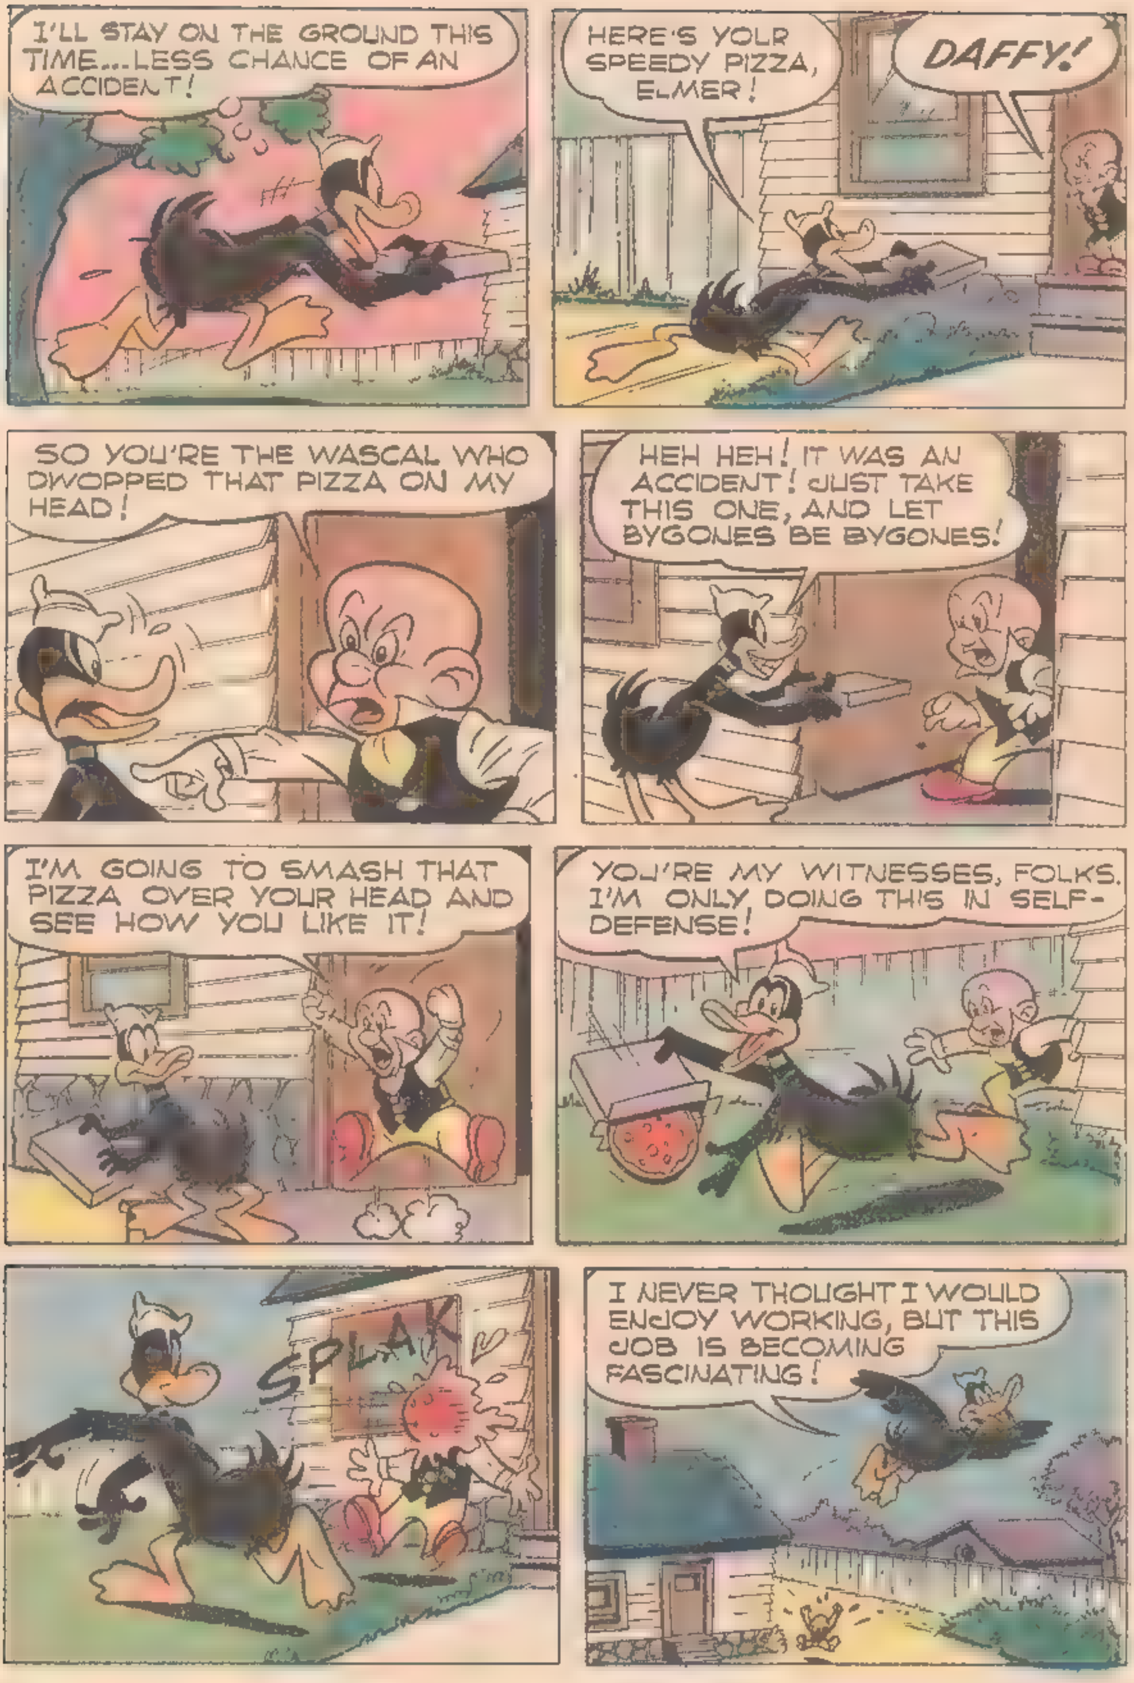

Henery picked up one of the chickens that had a crack in it and looked at it sadly. "Ollie Owl was wrong this time. Working is not what it is cracked up to be, after all," he said, staring at the row of china chickens.
